

The image shows a modern, industrial-style interior. In the foreground, a dark wooden desk holds a few items, including a red folder. To the left, a dark chair is partially visible. In the center, a bed with white and dark bedding is positioned in front of a large window with a dark frame. To the right, a long, light-colored concrete or stone ledge serves as a windowsill, holding folded towels, a vase with dried flowers, and other small objects. The walls are made of raw concrete, and the floor is also concrete. The overall atmosphere is quiet and minimalist.

In 2030 we believe most private space will transition into public space

A dimly lit, modern interior space, likely a loft or apartment. In the foreground, a dark wooden table holds a few items, including a small red box. To the left, a dark chair is partially visible. In the center, a bed with white and dark bedding is positioned in front of a large window with a dark frame. To the right, a long, light-colored concrete or stone ledge serves as a desk or counter, with a vase of dried flowers and some folded clothes on it. Another window is visible on the far right. The walls are made of raw concrete, and the floor is wooden. The overall atmosphere is quiet and contemplative.

So how do we preserve private space in order to maintain the feeling of home in 2030?
